Dear Mr. El-Darieby,

My name is Konrad Herbus, and I am currently finishing my third year of software engineering, whilst eagerly searching for a workplace opportunity. The purpose of this letter is to express my serious interest in taking part in this summer internship opportunity, and to highlight some of the key aspects that would make me an ideal candidate for the software development position.

As of today I have over five years of software programming experience, initially being based in multiple web programming languages along with SQL database management. This experience quickly progressed to other high level object oriented languages, each being used in a variety of different coding projects including :

- More than 35 logic based C++ applications
- Roughly 25 Python scripts and 20 class based Java projects
- Over 80 web pages involving PHP, MySQL, HTML, CSS, and Bootstrap
- Approximately 30 web projects using Javascript and JQuery
- Upwards of 35 command line C programs

Furthermore, last year I had the chance to work on a software development project used to streamline the completion, and subsequent collection of medical incident reports through a web based user interface. This was entirely planned, implemented and tested throughout the course of four months, whilst I was also under contract as a vaccine administrator, administering 60-80 vaccines daily.

Finally, as a software engineering student, I have already had the experience of working through numerous coding projects simultaneously with little to no guidance, while also managing the strict deadlines associated with each assignment. This is on top of juggling all my other extracurriculars and obligations I had previously agreed to, providing me with proficient time management skills.

Thank you for taking the time to read through my cover letter, and I appreciate your consideration of my inquiry towards this opportunity.

Sincerely,
Konrad Herbus
